Aquariums of Pyongyang: Ten Years in the North Korean Gulag

By Kang Chol-hwan and Pierre Rigoulot
Translated from French by Yair Reiner
Basic Books, NY, 2005, softcover, 238 pgs

Review by Hans Sherrer

Aquariums of Pyongyang is Kang Chol-hwan’s first person account of his life in North Korea and eventual escape to South Korea.

Chol-hwan was born in 1968 in Pyongyang, North Korea’s capital and largest city. His grandfather was a high government official, and his family had a lavish standard of living by North Korean standards. However, his grandfather courted danger by being an outspoken critic of the government’s inefficient bureaucracy. Chol-hwan was nine in July 1977 when his grandfather disappeared, a typical fate of government critics.

In North Korea an arrested person’s family is considered culpable for that member’s real or imagined offense, so a few weeks after his grandfather disappeared the Security Force (North Korea’s equivalent of the FBI) arrested Chol-hwan, his sister, father, grandmother and uncle. Political prisoners such as Chol-hwan’s family are confined in North Korea’s Gulag, which is comprised of a nationwide network of forced labor camps. (North Korea is about the size of Pennsylvania.) There is no intermingling between convicted criminals that are confined in regular prisons, and political prisoners in the Gulag. Chol-hwan’s family was immediately transported to the labor camp at Yodok.

Yodok is a very large valley enclosed on three sides by mountains that was turned into a vast labor camp by the erection of a barbed wire fence across its open end. The valley is also divided by barbed-wire fences into several camps that have no contact with one another. Many thousands of political prisoners are interned at Yodok.

Chol-hwan’s family was sent to Yodok’s camp for “redeemables.” Which meant that while they hadn’t been accused, tried, convicted or sentenced for committing any crime, they would only be released if the authorities thought they had successfully been re-educated into having unwavering loyalty to North Korea’s government. That also meant loyalty to KimIl-sung and his son, Kim Jong-il, who were not just North Korea’s leaders – but worshiped as gods.

There was also a camp at Yodok for “irredeemables” and their unfortunate family members. “Irredeemables” would never be released because their transgression – such as spying for South Korea or the United States – was considered too severe to be correctable. There were camps for “irredeemables” in other places – such as those set-up to build top secret military facilities – in which the prisoners were deliberately worked so hard and so ill-treated that none would survive to tell anyone outside the camp what they knew of the facility.

Chol-hwan candidly acknowledges the conditions at his family’s camp were better than what was experienced by the “irredeemables.” However, his description of the horrid living and working conditions at his camp and the punishments meted out for the slightest transgression makes you wonder how that is possible. The prisoners work seven days a week with two days off per year. The day begins at 5 a.m. and work generally ends at dark. A major industry is the brutally hard work of harvesting timber almost entirely by manual labor. The workers are slave laborers only provided with room and board, and the rudiments of life. The staple food is corn, but the food rations aren’t nutritious enough to stave off starvation or vitamin deficiency diseases. So survival depends on learning to acquire a taste for insects such as grasshoppers, roaches and ants. Rats are the only source of meat. Chol-hwan writes about how he thought of rats as vile disgusting creatures when he arrived at Yodok, but he learned to consider them as friendly animals vital to keeping him and his family alive.

Once a year a dozen or so “redeemable” families are released. After ten years Chol-hwan’s family was deemed rehabilitated. On the same day they were told they were being released, they were transported to live in a rural community. Chol-hwan was 19. Six years later he and his friend escaped across the border into China. As a control mechanism North Korean authorities typically punish the family members of an escapee, so Chol-hwan knew his family would likely suffer in the wake of him fleeing the country. After months dodging Chinese authorities that would have forcibly deported the two young men to North Korea, they made their way to South Korea.

The book’s title comes from the fish aquariums of Pyongyang that Chol-hwan had at the time of his arrest in Pyongyang. They symbolize the civility of his life in the city contrasted with the brutishness of life at Yodok. Co-author Pierre Rigoulot describes North Korea as the last Stalinist regime, and writes that upwards of...
Police Torture Victims Awarded $493,000

On July 21, 2010, twenty-one people tortured by the police were awarded a total of $493,000 (Kshs. 39.2 million) by Kenya’s High Court.

The 21 plaintiffs were tortured between 1982 and 1997 in what is now known as the Nyayo House Torture Chamber in Kenya’s capital of Nairobi. After their arrest for a variety of offenses, each of the twenty-one received the same treatment. They were stripped naked and held incommunicado in a completely dark waterlogged basement cell. When interrogated to obtain information or extract a confession, they were blasted with pressurized cold water, subjected to extreme heat and cold air, and denied sleep and nutrients during long interrogation sessions.

Some of the plaintiffs confessed and were sentenced to a prison term after pleading guilty. While those who didn’t confess continued to be held in the dungeon and interrogated – some for more than two years.

The twenty-one plaintiffs filed separate lawsuits against Kenya’s Attorney General seeking compensation for breach of their fundamental rights and freedoms under various sections of the Constitution of Kenya. Because they made similar claims all the lawsuits were combined.

The Attorney General’s four primary defenses were: the fundamental rights of Kenyans are not absolute so the plaintiff’s treatment was not illegal; the lawsuits were filed after expiration of the one-year statute of limitations; the lawsuits did not disclose the complete facts of their claims; and their claims of mistreatment should be handled by Kenya’s Truth, Justice and Reconciliation Commission. The High Court ruled in regard to those defenses:

- Kenya is a signatory to the “UN Convention against Torture, and other Cruel, Inhuman and Degrading Treatment or Punishment” that was ratified by Kenya, and its definition of torture is applicable to the Kenyan Constitution’s protection of fundamental rights and freedoms. Nyayo House was a government institution and the acts of physical and mental torture alleged by the plaintiffs were committed by government employees.
- “There was no limitation period for seeking redress for violation of the fundamental rights and freedoms of the individual under the Constitution of Kenya.”
- The plaintiffs had given sufficient particulars of their arrest and confinement to enable the A.G. to know the nature of the plaintiff’s claims.

In conclusion the High Court determined the twenty-one plaintiffs had each established substantial violations of their fundamental rights and freedoms under the Kenyan Constitution. The High Court awarded damages to the plaintiffs that varied from $12,579 (Kshs. 1 million) to $37,736 (Kshs. 3 million).

Note: Kshs. Are Kenyan shillings.

Sources:

Aquariums cont. from page 10

200,000 political prisoners are incarcerated at any given time in its forced labor camps – which is about 1% of the country’s population.

Aquariums of Pyongyang is the first published true-life account about the inner workings of the North Korean Gulag. It makes it evident that there is a rule of law in North Korea, but it is the rule that a person is subject to summary arrest and indeterminate confinement as a slave laborer with no option for challenging their imprisonment. Chol-hwan describes a Kafkaesque world in which innocence is irrelevant and no one knows whether he or she will ever be allowed to emerge from being buried alive in hell on earth.

Aquariums of Pyongyang is available from Justice: Denied’s BookShop for $15.95. (check, money order or stamps) Use the order form on page 15, or order with a credit card from Justice Denied’s website at http://justicdenied.org/books.html

Gladys and Jamie Scott Getting National Publicity In Bid For Mississippi Pardons

For years Nancy Lockhart was a lone voice in the wilderness advocating on behalf of the innocence of Gladys and Jamie Scott. In 1994 the sisters were convicted of robbing two men in Scott County, Mississippi of $11. The men were not injured. Three boys confessed to the robbery and agreed to plea deals giving them jail sentences of less than a year in exchange for testifying against the sisters, who insisted at their trial they were not involved in the robbery. Both sisters were convicted and sentenced to life in prison.

One of the boys has signed an affidavit the sisters didn’t have anything to do with the robbery and he only testified they were so he would get a short jail sentence. There are also two other affidavits clearing the sisters of the crime.

The Scott sisters filed a pardon petition, and the outrageousness of thier case has attracted national attention, even being featured on MSNBC. Even without their credible claim of innocence, life in prison for a non-violent $11 robbery is draconian.

More than three hundred people rallied in support of the Scott Sisters at the capital in Jackson, Mississippi on September 15, 2010. The Jackson Clarion-Ledger published a major article with pictures.

For current information about the Scott Sisters and who you can contact to help them in their effort to be pardoned. See their website maintained by their mother, http://www.freethescottsisters.blogspot.com